A: `awk -v OFS=' \t\t' -F,' '$1 ~ /^[^A-Z.]+/` Empty string is a special character in awk, that is why we remove it from our match. `$1` - holds the first field of the line, i.e., "e.g. pdf, html" `~` - is used to check for membership. In this case, it means "check if the first field is a string". `$1 ~ /^[^A-Z.]+/` - check if the first field matches the regular expression "`^[^A-Z.]+`", in which `\t` is `\t` literal, and `A-Z` are upper case characters. `OFS=""` - have the input record separated by tab.

We have recently installed VS2010 as a Dev and Test environment. The majority of our projects are (used to be in) C#. As a part of our automated build process we have build analyzers which fail because C# 4.0 support is required. My question is - should these build analyzers be part of the build, or deployed separately. If deployed separately, how can these project analyzers be deployed as part of the c# project, or is it better to just deploy them separately? Thanks A: This is just a great question; I also am using the VS2010 as a dev and test environment. The answer is that the analyzers should be deployed in the same way as the rest of f678ea9f9e
